

- ☐ Explain the general guidelines that Islamic Shariah has given to run our political activities and then differentiate between the Islamic and conventional systems of politics. [Sp24]

Or

Discuss three fundamental elements of Islamic Political System and then differentiate between Islamic and conventional system of politics. [Sp23]

Islamic politics is based on the teachings of Islamic Shari'ah which comes from the Qur'an and the Sunnah of Prophet Muhammad (peace be upon him). In Islam, politics is not only about power or government; it is mainly about establishing justice ('Adl), ensuring public welfare (Maslahah), and creating a society where people can live according to the guidance of Allah. Islamic Shari'ah teaches that all authority ultimately belongs to Allah, and human rulers are only trustees or representatives (Khalifah) who must rule according to divine guidance. Therefore, political leaders in Islam must follow moral principles such as honesty, justice, accountability, and consultation with the people. Leadership in Islam is considered a trust (Amanah), and rulers are responsible for using their authority for the benefit of society rather than for personal interest or power.

One of the most important guidelines of Islamic political activity is the principle of consultation (Shura). The Qur'an commands Muslims to conduct their affairs through consultation so that decisions are made collectively and wisely. Through Shura, different opinions are discussed and the most beneficial decision is chosen. Another guideline is the concept of justice ('Adl), which means that rulers must treat all citizens equally regardless of their religion, ethnicity, or social status. Islam strongly emphasizes fairness in governance and prohibits oppression or discrimination. Islam also emphasizes accountability (Mas'uliyah), meaning that rulers are responsible not only to the people but also to Allah on the Day of Judgment. In addition, Islamic political activity must protect the basic rights of citizens such as life, property, honor, and religious freedom, because Islam teaches that human dignity must always be respected.

The Islamic political system is different from conventional political systems in many ways. In the Islamic system, sovereignty belongs to Allah, while in most modern political systems sovereignty belongs to the people or the state. In Islam, law is mainly derived from divine sources like the Qur'an and Sunnah, while in conventional systems laws are created mainly by human decision and political interests. Another difference is that Islamic politics strongly connects religion, morality, and governance, whereas modern politics often separates religion from the state. Furthermore, the objective of Islamic politics is not only political stability or economic progress but also the moral and spiritual development of society. By following the principles of Shari'ah, justice, and consultation, Islamic politics aims to establish a balanced society where both worldly welfare and spiritual values are protected.

☐ Define Islamic Politics. Explain the basic principles of Islamic political system elaborately. [Au25]

Or

What is Islamic political system? Explain its fundamental principles. [Sp25]

Or

Define Islamic political system and discuss the main principles of it with proper evidences from the Qur'an and Sunnah. [Sp23]

Islamic politics refers to the system of governance and political organization that is based on the teachings of Islamic Shari'ah and guided by the Qur'an and the Sunnah. In Islam, politics is considered a responsibility to establish justice, protect human rights, and ensure the welfare of society. It is not merely about gaining power or controlling the state but about implementing the values of Islam in social and political life. Islamic political thought emphasizes that rulers are servants of the people and trustees of Allah who must govern with honesty, fairness, and accountability.

One of the fundamental principles of Islamic political system is Tawhid, which means the absolute unity and sovereignty of Allah. According to this principle, ultimate authority belongs only to Allah, and all political decisions must follow the guidance of divine revelation. Another important principle is justice ('Adl). Islam commands rulers to maintain justice in all aspects of governance, ensuring that no person is oppressed or treated unfairly. Justice is considered the foundation of a stable and peaceful society.

Another major principle is consultation (Shura). Islam encourages leaders to consult knowledgeable and trustworthy people before making decisions. This principle promotes participation and prevents dictatorship or misuse of power. The concept of accountability (Mas'uliyah) is also essential in Islamic politics. Leaders must answer to both the people and Allah for their actions. If a ruler becomes unjust or corrupt, the society has the right to criticize and correct him.

Islamic political system also focuses on public welfare (Maslahah) and protection of human dignity. The government must ensure economic justice, provide security, protect religious freedom, and maintain social harmony. Therefore, Islamic politics combines spiritual values with political administration and aims to create a balanced society where moral, social, and political responsibilities are fulfilled.

☐ Define Shariah and explain some characteristics of a constitution under Islamic Shariah. [Sp24]

Or

What is meant by Shariah? Analyze the key features of a constitution that follows Shariah. [Au25]

Shari'ah refers to the divine law of Islam which is mainly derived from the Qur'an and the Sunnah of Prophet Muhammad (peace be upon him). The word Shari'ah literally means "the path" or "the correct way to follow." It is a complete system of guidance that regulates not only religious worship such as prayer and fasting, but also social relations, economic activities, legal matters, and political governance. In Islamic thought, Shari'ah provides the moral and legal framework through which Muslims organize their personal and collective life according to the will of Allah. The main purpose of Shari'ah is to establish justice, protect human dignity, and ensure peace and welfare in society.

A constitution based on Islamic Shari'ah has several important characteristics. The first characteristic is the sovereignty of Allah. This means that the ultimate authority belongs only to Allah, and all laws and policies must remain consistent with the teachings of the Qur'an and Sunnah. Human rulers and legislators may create regulations to manage the affairs of the state, but these laws must never contradict the fundamental principles of Islam.

Another important characteristic is the emphasis on justice ('Adl) and equality. Justice is considered the foundation of Islamic governance. The ruler must treat all citizens fairly regardless of their religion, ethnicity, or social background. Islam strongly opposes oppression, discrimination, and injustice. Therefore, the state must ensure that every person receives fair treatment and protection under the law.

The Islamic constitution also emphasizes the principle of consultation (Shura). Important political and administrative decisions should be made through consultation with scholars, experts, and representatives of the people. This consultative process often takes place through the institution known as the Majlis ash-Shura. Consultation helps leaders make wise decisions and prevents misuse of power.

Another important feature of an Islamic constitution is the protection of fundamental human rights. Islam guarantees important rights such as the right to life, property, dignity, and religious freedom. The state must protect these rights and ensure that people can live peacefully and securely in society.

Finally, an Islamic constitutional system emphasizes accountability and responsibility (Mas'uliyah). Political authority is considered a trust (Amanah) given by Allah, and rulers must govern with honesty, fairness, and integrity. Leaders are responsible for their actions not only before the people but also before Allah. Through these principles of sovereignty, justice, consultation, rights, and accountability, the Islamic constitutional system aims to establish a balanced society based on morality, justice, and collective welfare.

□ Define shariah and then analyze the sources of shariah with some examples. [Au23]

Shari'ah is the divine legal and moral system of Islam that guides Muslims in every aspect of life. It provides rules and principles for worship, social relations, economic activities, and political governance. The word Shari'ah means "the right path" that leads people toward a just and righteous life according to the guidance of Allah. The main purpose of Shari'ah is to promote justice, protect human dignity, and ensure the welfare and stability of society. Through Shari'ah, Muslims learn how to maintain moral conduct, establish fairness in society, and follow the teachings of Islam in both personal and collective life. Islamic scholars derive the laws of Shari'ah from several authentic and reliable sources.

The first and most important source of Shari'ah is the Qur'an, which Muslims believe to be the direct revelation of Allah to Prophet Muhammad (peace be upon him). The Qur'an contains fundamental principles regarding faith, worship, morality, justice, and social conduct. It provides clear guidance on many aspects of life such as honesty in business, fairness in judgment, and compassion toward others. For example, the Qur'an commands believers to establish justice ('Adl) and strictly prohibits oppression, corruption, and injustice. Because it is the word of Allah, the Qur'an is considered the highest and most authoritative source of Islamic law.

The second source is the Sunnah, which refers to the sayings, actions, and approvals of Prophet Muhammad (peace be upon him). The Sunnah explains and clarifies the teachings of the Qur'an and provides practical examples of how Islamic principles should be implemented in daily life. Through the Sunnah, Muslims learn how the Prophet applied the teachings of Islam in social, legal, and political matters. For example, the Sunnah explains how to perform prayer, how to conduct fair trade, and how to resolve disputes among people.

Another important source is Ijma, which means the consensus or agreement of qualified Islamic scholars on a particular issue. When scholars carefully study the Qur'an and Sunnah and reach a common agreement about a ruling, that consensus becomes an authoritative guideline for the Muslim community. Ijma helps maintain unity and ensures that Islamic law remains consistent with the original teachings of Islam.

The fourth source is Qiyas, which refers to analogical reasoning. Scholars use Qiyas to derive rulings for new situations that are not directly mentioned in the Qur'an or Sunnah. This is done by comparing a new issue with an existing ruling that has a similar cause or principle. Through Qiyas, Islamic law can address modern problems while remaining faithful to its original foundations.

Together, the Qur'an, Sunnah, Ijma, and Qiyas form the main sources of Islamic law. These sources provide a comprehensive framework for understanding and applying Shari'ah in different situations. They ensure that Islamic law remains balanced, adaptable, and capable of guiding Muslims in every age and society.

□ Define Islamic constitution and describe the special features of it with some details.
[Au23]

An Islamic Constitution is a system of fundamental laws and principles that organizes the political structure of a state according to the teachings of Islamic Shari'ah. It determines how the government functions, how authority is exercised, and how the rights and responsibilities of citizens are protected. Unlike many modern constitutions that are based purely on human ideas, the Islamic constitution derives its inspiration from the Qur'an and the Sunnah of Prophet Muhammad (peace be upon him). The primary objective of an Islamic constitution is to establish justice, maintain social harmony, and guide society according to the moral and spiritual values of Islam.

One of the most important features of an Islamic constitution is the sovereignty of Allah (Hakimiyyah). In Islam, ultimate authority belongs to Allah alone, and all laws must conform to the guidance revealed in the Qur'an and Sunnah. Human rulers and legislators do not have unlimited power; they must govern within the boundaries set by divine law. This principle ensures that political authority is exercised responsibly and that the government cannot enact laws that contradict Islamic values.

Another important feature is the principle of justice ('Adl). Justice is considered the foundation of Islamic governance. The constitution must ensure equality before the law and protect people from oppression and injustice. Islam strongly emphasizes fairness in economic, social, and political matters. The ruler is responsible for ensuring that justice prevails in every aspect of society.

The Islamic constitution also includes the principle of consultation (Shura). Decisions concerning public affairs should not be made unilaterally by the ruler. Instead, the leader should consult scholars, experts, and representatives of the people through institutions like the Majlis ash-Shura. This promotes collective decision-making and prevents authoritarian rule.

Another important feature is the protection of fundamental rights. Islamic constitutional principles guarantee basic human rights such as the right to life, property, dignity, and religious practice. Islam teaches that every human being has inherent dignity, and the state must protect these rights. In addition, leaders are required to maintain accountability (Mas'uliyah) and transparency, as they are responsible before both the people and Allah.

Through these features, an Islamic constitution seeks to establish a balanced political system that combines moral guidance, justice, and effective governance.

☐ What are the qualities of the chief executive of an Islamic State? Discuss them with some details. [Sp24]

Or

Summarize the qualities of Chief Executive of an Islamic State. Explain the main duties of the Chief Executive. [Au25]

Or

What are the qualities of the chief executive of an Islamic state? Analyze the functions of the executive. [Sp25]

In an Islamic political system, the chief executive is the head of the state who governs according to Islamic Shari'ah. In Islamic history the ruler is often called Khalifah, Imam, or Amir al-Mu'minin. These terms mean a leader who manages the affairs of the Muslim community following the guidance of Allah, the Qur'an, and the Sunnah of Prophet Muhammad (peace be upon him). Leadership in Islam is not considered a privilege or personal power; rather it is a trust (Amanah) that must be fulfilled with honesty and responsibility.

The chief executive must possess several important qualities. The first and most important quality is piety (Taqwa). The leader must fear Allah and follow Islamic values so that his decisions remain fair and morally correct. Another important quality is justice ('Adl). Islam strongly emphasizes justice, and the ruler must treat all citizens equally without discrimination. He must ensure that no person is oppressed and that everyone receives their rights.

Another important quality is knowledge ('Ilm). The leader should understand Islamic law and the social conditions of society so that he can make wise decisions. Honesty and trustworthiness (Amanah) are also necessary because leadership is a responsibility given by the people and by Allah. A dishonest ruler may misuse power and harm the society. In addition, the chief executive should have wisdom and leadership ability (Hikmah) to manage the affairs of the state properly.

The chief executive has several important duties. One major duty is to implement Islamic Shari'ah and ensure that the laws of the state follow Islamic principles. Another duty is to maintain peace and justice in society by enforcing laws and protecting people from crime and injustice. The ruler must also protect the country from external threats and ensure national security.

The chief executive must also consult the Majlis ash-Shura before making important decisions. This process of consultation (Shura) helps maintain fairness and collective decision-making. In addition, the ruler must protect the basic rights of citizens, including life, property, dignity, and religious freedom.

In conclusion, the chief executive in an Islamic state must be a person of strong faith, justice, knowledge, and honesty. By fulfilling his duties with Taqwa, 'Adl, and Amanah, the leader can establish a just and stable society based on the principles of Islam.

□ What is the qur'anic and sunnetic term for the chief executive? Describe his qualifications with proper arguments. [Au23]

Or

What is the Quranic and sunnatic term for the chief executive? Describe his qualifications in an Islamic state. [Sp23]

In an Islamic political system, the chief executive of the state is generally referred to by terms such as Khalifah, Imam, or Amir al-Mu'minin. These terms appear in Islamic political thought and are connected with the leadership of the Muslim community. The word Khalifah literally means "successor" or "representative," indicating a person who governs the community according to the guidance of Allah and the teachings of Islamic Shari'ah. The concept of leadership in Islam is not based on absolute authority or personal power; rather it is considered a trust (Amanah) that must be exercised with justice, responsibility, and moral integrity. The Qur'an describes human beings as vicegerents (Khalifah) on earth, meaning that rulers must govern in a way that reflects the divine principles of justice and righteousness.

The chief executive in an Islamic state must possess several important qualifications. The first and most important qualification is faith and piety (Taqwa). A leader must have strong belief in Allah and deep commitment to Islamic values so that his decisions are guided by moral responsibility. Without piety and fear of Allah, a ruler may misuse power or become unjust. The second qualification is justice ('Adl). Islam places great emphasis on fairness and equality. The chief executive must ensure that every citizen is treated fairly and that no one is oppressed or deprived of their rights.

Another important qualification is knowledge ('Ilm). The leader should have a good understanding of Islamic law, political affairs, and social conditions so that he can govern wisely. Knowledge enables the leader to interpret the principles of Qur'an and Sunnah correctly and apply them to practical situations. In addition, the chief executive must possess honesty and trustworthiness (Amanah). Since leadership is considered a sacred responsibility, the ruler must handle public resources carefully and avoid corruption or misuse of authority.

The leader must also have administrative ability and wisdom (Hikmah). Governing a state requires skill in decision-making, management, and diplomacy. The chief executive should be capable of maintaining peace, protecting the state from external threats, and ensuring economic stability. Another important quality is the ability to practice consultation (Shura). Islam encourages leaders to consult scholars, experts, and representatives of the people before making major decisions.

In summary, the chief executive in an Islamic state is not merely a political ruler but a moral and responsible leader who governs according to the principles of Shari'ah, justice, and consultation. Through qualities such as Taqwa, 'Adl, Amanah, and Hikmah, the leader is expected to establish a just and balanced society that reflects the ethical teachings of Islam.

☐ Evaluate the Legislative Organ of the Government under the Shuratic perspective and mention the functions of the legislative body of the state. [Sp24]

Or

Evaluate the legislative organ of the government from Islamic perspective and briefly explain the function of Majlish-e-Surah. [Sp25]

In an Islamic political system, the legislative organ is responsible for developing policies, interpreting Islamic law, and advising the ruler on matters related to governance. Unlike many modern political systems where legislators have absolute authority to create laws, the legislative body in Islam operates within the framework of Islamic Shari'ah. This means that all laws must remain consistent with the teachings of the Qur'an and Sunnah. The legislative organ therefore does not replace divine law but helps apply it to new situations and changing circumstances.

The most important institution in Islamic legislative structure is the Majlis ash-Shura, which literally means the council of consultation. The concept of Shura is based on Qur'anic teachings that encourage believers to conduct their affairs through mutual consultation. Members of the Shura are usually knowledgeable individuals, scholars, and representatives who possess wisdom, experience, and understanding of Islamic law.

The Majlis ash-Shura performs several important functions. One of its primary functions is consultation and advice. The council assists the chief executive by providing guidance on political, economic, and social matters. Through discussion and debate, members analyze problems and recommend solutions that are consistent with Islamic principles.

Another important function is interpretation and application of Islamic law. In many situations, new issues arise that are not directly mentioned in the Qur'an or Sunnah. In such cases, members of the Shura analyze the issue using methods like Ijma and Qiyas to determine appropriate policies. This helps the government address modern challenges while remaining faithful to Islamic teachings.

The Majlis ash-Shura also plays a role in monitoring the government and ensuring accountability. Members can question decisions, criticize unjust policies, and provide constructive suggestions. This prevents misuse of power and ensures that the government serves the interests of the people.

Therefore, the legislative organ in Islam is not merely a political institution but a consultative body that helps establish justice, maintain balance of power, and ensure that governance follows the guidance of Islamic Shari'ah.

□ How many kinds of majlish ash-shura in an Islamic state? Describe the functions of the members of shura in details. [Au23]

In an Islamic state, the Majlis ash-Shura is the consultative council that assists the ruler in managing the affairs of the state. The concept of Shura comes from the teachings of the Qur'an, which encourages Muslims to conduct their affairs through consultation and mutual discussion. This principle ensures that important political and social decisions are not made by one person alone but through collective wisdom and participation. The system of Shura promotes justice, cooperation, and balance in governance and helps prevent misuse of power by encouraging discussion and shared responsibility.

Islamic scholars generally describe two main types of Shura councils. The first type is the general consultative council, which includes representatives of the people, scholars, and experienced individuals from different parts of society. These members discuss issues related to public welfare, social development, and national matters. Their role is to represent the views and interests of the community and help guide the government toward decisions that benefit the entire society.

The second type is the special advisory council, which consists of experts, jurists, and scholars who have deep knowledge of Islamic Shari'ah and other specialized fields such as law, economics, and administration. These experts provide advice on complex legal, political, and social matters and help ensure that government policies remain consistent with Islamic teachings and moral values.

Members of the Shura have several important responsibilities. One of their main functions is to advise the ruler on matters of governance by carefully analyzing social, economic, and political issues. Another important responsibility is participation in policy formulation, where the council discusses new challenges and recommends solutions that promote justice and welfare while remaining consistent with Islamic principles. Members of the Shura also help protect public interest and ensure accountability by questioning policies that may be harmful or unjust and by maintaining transparency in governance.

In addition, the Shura helps promote unity and cooperation within the Muslim community by encouraging dialogue and consultation among different groups. Through these responsibilities, the Majlis ash-Shura serves as an important institution that strengthens justice, accountability, participation, and responsible leadership in an Islamic political system.

☐ Explain briefly:

- a. Law-making process of the Majlis-e-Shura;
- b. Nature of the judiciary before and during the prophetic era;
- c. Common rights and duties of citizens in an Islamic state;
- d. Difference between Shari'a and Manmade law;
- e. Organs of government. [Au25]

a. Law-making process of the Majlis-e-Shura

The Majlis-e-Shura is the consultative council in an Islamic political system that assists the ruler in making decisions related to governance and public welfare. The process of law-making in the Shura begins with consultation and discussion among scholars, experts, and representatives of the people. When a new issue or problem arises, members of the council carefully examine it and analyze whether there is any clear guidance in the Qur'an or the Sunnah of Prophet Muhammad (peace be upon him). These two sources are the primary foundations of Islamic law, and any new policy or rule must remain consistent with them.

If the matter is not directly mentioned in the Qur'an or Sunnah, Islamic scholars may apply Ijma, which means the consensus of qualified scholars, or Qiyas, which refers to analogical reasoning based on existing Islamic rulings. Through these methods, the Shura derives suitable laws that address modern situations while remaining faithful to Islamic teachings. The purpose of this consultative law-making process is to ensure justice, protect public welfare, and maintain harmony in society. In this way, the Majlis-e-Shura plays an important role in ensuring that governance follows the moral and legal principles of Islamic Shari'ah.

b. Nature of the judiciary before and during the prophetic era

Before the prophetic era, many societies did not have an organized system of justice. Disputes were often settled according to tribal customs, traditions, or the authority of powerful leaders. In many cases, justice depended on social status or tribal loyalty, which sometimes led to unfair decisions and oppression. There was no consistent legal framework that ensured equality for all people.

However, during the time of Prophet Muhammad (peace be upon him), a structured and fair judicial system was established based on the principles of Islam. The Prophet himself acted as the chief judge, resolving disputes among people according to the guidance of Allah revealed in the Qur'an. His judgments emphasized justice, honesty, and equality. Later, as the Muslim community expanded, the Prophet appointed qualified companions as judges in different regions to handle legal matters.

The Islamic judiciary during the prophetic era ensured that everyone was equal before the law, regardless of wealth or social status. Even powerful individuals could be held accountable if they acted unjustly. This system laid the foundation for a fair and organized judicial structure in the Islamic state.

c. Common rights and duties of citizens in an Islamic state

In an Islamic state, citizens are granted several fundamental rights that are protected by Islamic law. These rights include the right to life, property, honor, and religious freedom. Islam teaches that every human being possesses dignity and deserves respect regardless of their social status, ethnicity, or background. The state has the responsibility to ensure that these rights are protected and that people can live peacefully and securely.

At the same time, citizens also have important duties and responsibilities toward the state and society. They must obey just laws, maintain social harmony, and respect the rights of others. Citizens are also expected to support the welfare of the community by cooperating with the government and contributing positively to society.

Islam emphasizes a balance between rights and responsibilities. When citizens fulfill their duties and the government protects their rights, a peaceful, stable, and cooperative society can be established.

d. Difference between Shari'ah and Man-made law

The main difference between Shari'ah and man-made law lies in their source and authority. Shari'ah originates from divine revelation, mainly the Qur'an and the Sunnah of Prophet Muhammad (peace be upon him). Because it is based on divine guidance from Allah, Shari'ah is considered perfect, moral, and universal. Its purpose is to establish justice, guide human behavior, and ensure the welfare of society according to ethical principles.

Man-made law, on the other hand, is created by human beings through political institutions or legislative bodies. These laws are often influenced by social conditions, cultural values, and political interests. As a result, man-made laws may change frequently according to circumstances and may sometimes lack moral or spiritual foundations.

While Shari'ah provides permanent principles of justice and morality, human laws mainly regulate social and administrative matters. In an Islamic system, man-made regulations may exist, but they must remain consistent with the fundamental teachings of Shari'ah.

e. Organs of government

An Islamic government generally consists of three main organs, which work together to maintain justice, stability, and effective administration. These organs are the executive, the legislative, and the judiciary.

The executive authority is responsible for implementing laws and managing the administration of the state. It is usually led by the chief executive, such as the Khalifah or ruler, who ensures that government policies follow the principles of Islamic Shari'ah.

The legislative authority is mainly represented by the Majlis-e-Shura. This council assists the ruler in developing policies and interpreting Islamic principles when dealing with new issues. Through consultation and discussion, the legislative body helps create regulations that benefit society while remaining consistent with Islamic teachings.

The judiciary is responsible for interpreting and applying the law in order to maintain justice among citizens. Judges resolve disputes and ensure that laws are implemented fairly and equally. These three organs work together to create a balanced system of governance that promotes justice, accountability, and the welfare of the community.